

— The Create Streets Story —

"Six years ago I resigned from my job to set up the social enterprise Create Streets, to argue on the ground, in councils and in Parliament that new homes and places should be more popular, more beautiful and developed in line with the strong evidence of the types of places that people like and where they want to live. Places with real centres and "gentle density" of terraced homes and mansion blocks benefit both from the advantages of lower density (more space, cleaner air, less stress) and also from the advantages of greater density (more walking, knowing more of your neighbours, more sustainable energy usage). People are healthier and happier in such places, leave a much lighter environmental footprint and, if they can afford it, will nearly always pay more to live there.

We have done ground-breaking research that has featured in several academic journals and the specialist and mainstream media. And we are starting to have a major impact on the actual policy decisions of councils and the Government. For example, I have recently been co-chairing the Government's Building Better Building Beautiful Commission, which seems set to have a major influence on planning policy. But we are only at the cusp of what we hope will be a profound re-ordering of the nature of places we create and our stewardship of the ones we already have. We are seeking to increase our resources to support far more neighbourhood groups, improve the breadth and depth of our research and share our findings and best practice more widely with councillors, developers, politicians and civil society.

Today we invite you to become part of the story in building a more beautiful and prosperous Britain for all our fellow citizens."
